The image features a central, light-colored silhouette of a woman with shoulder-length hair, wearing a long-sleeved top and a skirt. Behind her is a large, golden sunburst or halo effect. The background is a textured, light brown color. In the lower half, there is a horizontal band with a darker, orange-brown background and a subtle, repeating pattern of small, ornate swirls. The text is overlaid on this band. White decorative swirls are also present on the left and right sides of the image, partially overlapping the woman's silhouette and the patterned band.

Why is finding breast cancer early so important?

- Most breast cancers take years to develop.
- Early on, most breast cancers don't cause any physical symptoms, so without a mammogram, there's no way to know you have it.
- When breast cancer is found early, it doesn't get the chance to spread to other places.
- 80% of breast lumps are non-cancerous.
- Every woman's breast tissue is different. Getting screened every year is very important to help your health care provider find small changes in your breast tissue. This helps them find cancer as early as possible.

Why is finding cervical cancer early so important?

- A Pap test can find abnormal cervical cells years before any cancer actually exists.
- Early on, cervical cancer usually doesn't cause symptoms, so without a test there is no way to know it's there.
- The earlier cervical cancer is found, the better the chances of survival.
- Receiving a Pap test once a year can help you detect and even prevent cancer of the cervix.
